

Three-session run-sheet

A working shape for a three-session arc — one first session and two follow-ups that carry the same person from being guided toward practising confidently on their own.

"The person already holds the resources they need. The work is to help them find their own way to them."

Two things to hold across every hour: pace it slower than feels natural — silence is doing work — and let the person lead on how far to go, especially anyone early in their injury. The timings are a guide, not a clock to obey.

Setting the ground

Sixty minutes. More setup than the others, because you're meeting each other and finding the direction together.

5 min

Settle in

Welcome them. Check they're comfortable and won't be interrupted, and that the audio and screen are working. Set the tone in a sentence: a quiet space to work together, not a clinical appointment.

10 min

Find the direction

Solution-oriented questions rather than a symptom intake. What would make this hour worth their while? What have they already tried, and what's even slightly working? Listen for the resource to build on, and decide together which practice you're heading toward. This is also where you notice their healing style, which shapes the plan you hand them afterward. If the goal they name has no built practice, don't reach for a script: shape the imagery around it live, in your own voice.

5 min

Frame the practice

Briefly explain what you'll do and the honest caveat: this is mental rehearsal that may influence the brain's motor circuits, not a guaranteed outcome, and they should say so if any discomfort rises. Keep it short — a doorway, not the room.

20 min

The guided practice

Guide one core practice live, in your own voice, responding in real time. Watch their breathing, slow to their pace, and adapt the imagery to the details they gave you earlier.

12 min

Come back and reflect

Let them surface slowly. Ask what they noticed, in their own words, without leading. Name what worked, however small. Point them to the reflection journal if they'd like to track it privately.

8 min

Close and hand forward

Agree one small, achievable next step. Introduce the three daily rest windows so the practice lives between sessions. Afterward, complete their personal plan and send it on.

SESSION TWO

Finding the rhythm and going deeper

The setup is done, so most of the hour goes to the practice itself, and to meeting whatever got in the way.

5 min

Re-settle

A warm welcome back and a breath together before you begin. No need to re-explain the frame.

10 min

What's shifted

Solution-oriented review. What did they try since last time? What worked, even a little? Where did it get hard? Build from what's working rather than what's missing, and meet the ordinary block plainly — impatience, discomfort, or the feeling that nothing is happening. Point to the "When Nothing Seems to Be Happening" page if it helps.

25 min

The practice, deepened

Return to the same core practice, now adapting the imagery to what they reported. Go longer than the first time, or introduce a second practice if the first has settled. Let the imagery become more their own than yours.

10 min

Reflect

What was different this time? Name the change, however small, as real evidence rather than hope.

10 min

The windows, in practice

Work the three daily rest windows together — how to notice the mid-morning and mid-afternoon drift phases. Agree one small thing to carry into the week.

SESSION THREE

Becoming self-directed

The aim of the whole arc: that they can carry the practice on without you.

5 min

Re-settle

Welcome back, and settle.

10 min

Review the arc

Look back across the three sessions together. What's changed since the first hour? Let them say it in their own words.

10 min

Build their own imagery

Co-create the imagery vocabulary they'll use alone — their images, their words, not borrowed ones.

20 min

A practice they lead

Guide less. Let them run more of it, so it feels like theirs by the end.

8 min

Reflect and consolidate

Draw the threads together. What have they learned they can rely on?

7 min

Continuing alone

Plan for practising without sessions, using the daily windows. Taper rather than stop abruptly. The door stays open, with no pressure to return.
